Abstract Castracane's diatom collection from the H.M.S. Challenger voyage, housed in the Natural History Museum, London (BM), was examined for type slides. Of the 259 taxa described in his report, 17 type specimens have been discovered. Details of their type status and illustrations are provided.

Key words: Castracane, diatoms, H.M.S. Challenger, Type.

Introduction

Francesco Saverio Castracane degli Antelminelli (1817–1899, referred to as Castrance; see TL2, volume 1, p. 469, 1976 and TL2, supplement 3, pp. 460–462, 1995 for details of Castracane's biographers, collections and major publications) described 259 taxa in his report on the diatoms collected on the H.M.S. Challenger voyage (Castracane 1886, see also Castracane 1887 [“1886”]), which are important for the taxonomy of marine diatoms (T-2 in CD).

The Castracane diatom collection in the Natural History Museum, London (BM) consists of 143 microscope slides (T-1 in CD). Roughly half of these slides consist of a single valve and/or a single species, with its name attached to the label. Twenty three slides have the annotation “n. sp.” indicating their possible holotype status. As there is no certainty of their status, the specimens below are considered as lectotypes. The remaining slides are strewn mounts with the annotation “Collections of H.M.S. Challenger” with longitude and latitude indicated or a place name.

No other slide collection exists of Castracane Challenger material. Some of the original material collected on the Challenger voyage is retained in the Mineralogy Department, Natural History Museum, London, and should be considered as isotype material.

Methods

An Olympus BH2 microscope equipped with Zeiss objectives (40× and 63×) and Lumera CCD camera (LU135M) was used for the micrographs. The 40× was used as some of the slides in Castracane's collection have coverslips that are too thick for the use of the 63× lens.
